Excerpt: . . . day, as she crouched, fascinated with terror, among the pillows, she was quite prepared to see him enter--avenger of blood--with the ministers of justice at his heels. She had all the popular dread of the law, and much more than the popular ignorance of its powers. For months past, moreover, she had been cultivating professionally a naturally picturesque and powerful imagination; and her nerves had scarcely recovered a shock severe enough to have tried less artistically sensitive ones than hers. So it happened that when, at last, towards nightfall, George did come in, she shut her eyes and cowered beneath the coverings, awaiting doom. He only made a few cold inquiries after her health and her requirements. Annes courage revived at this; she looked up, and answered meekly and almost deprecatingly. Then he stood a few minutes in an awkward silence. At last he said--The inquest will be held to-morrow, at two oclock, at the Lamb and Flag. The funeral I have arranged for the following morning, at eleven. Perhaps Miss Barratt will help you pack up, in the course of to-morrow, so that we shall not need to return here afterwards, but can go at once to the lodgings I have engaged. The inquest Anne had heard nothing else. And I must go Of course; the doctor assures me there is nothing to prevent it. His coldness took on a tone of bitterness. I trust, Anne, he went on, that you will make...
