Just then the dinner began to hiss in the oven, a fragrant odour prevaded the room, and when in halfan-hour after, the table was spread, Jone o Pee s took his place beside his future dame, the happiest man in all Hazelworth. About one o clock the following morning, when the hitherto noisy village had sunk into quiet, and only a few stragglers, worse for the day s pastime, could be met with, the hero of the preceding pages might have been seen cleaving the moonlight on his way home. His person was not so erect as when he entered Hazelworth in the morning. His chin hung upon his breast, and his once white stockings, now a darkish grey, seemed to be describing a very eccentric zig-zag as he stumbled from stile to stile on his difficult journey. From his hat streamed a dirty pink ribbon, won at the Golden Ball dance, for Jone was an adept at heel-an toe wark, and his red breeches looked as if they had been cultivating acquaintance with the chimney, so soiled were they with ale, tobacco ashes and road dust. When he entered his domicile, where his daughter was waiting up for him, he looked round with a sort of hazy contemplativeness, and the only response which could be elicited from the several enquiries which the girl made,...
