It is important to detect these cases before operation, and in case of doubt, the previous history will generally give some indication. One frequent symptom is the liability to sudden and painful swelling in one or more joints, occurring spontaneously, or as the result of some slight injury. The treatment--apart from general or constitutional treatment which to be effective, should have been seen to before the operation--is mainly local, and consists of pressure, styptics and cold applications. Pressure is most effective after teeth extraction, and should be immediately resorted to. Clear out the cavity thoroughly, plug with lint and compress by a bandage under the chin. Of the numerous styptics, the best is perchloride of iron. Cold, in the form of ice or ice-cold water, will arrest haemorrhage if continuously applied. There are many...
